FIELD NOTES

Reflections from FOROMIC 2012:
Who Will Lead Microfinance into the Next Generation?

As I listen to the waves gently gliding across shades of turquoise in the Caribbean Sea, I am swaying on a hammock under some palms, thinking about microfinance? I am taking advantage of American Airlines’ delays as I recover from the annual FOROMIC conference in Barbados, which was hosted by the Multilateral Investment Fund/Inter-American Development Bank (MIF/IDB). The conference location reflects some real shifts in thinking about financial access gaps and where donors can make a difference. Unlike most of the places I travel, the roads of Barbados are not peppered with financial service options. I haven’t seen pawnshops, microfinance institutions (MFIs), NGOs and cooperatives on every corner. Holding the event in Barbados seemed to symbolize the idea that there is still more to do in financial access. The subtext was that the industry in Latin America has evolved to an extent that there may not be much left for large donors to do here. Today, the microfinance industry in Latin America offers a variety of institutions in most of the region (excluding Barbados and a few other countries) that are doing business with less and less subsidy. These institutions are funded by a variety of commercial (and some non-commercial) vehicles. Of the USD 500 billion invested by microfinance investment vehicles in the sector worldwide, a large part is still placed in the region. So what is left for donors and other stakeholders to do?

The FOROMIC agenda seemed a bit out-of-focus, reflecting the sector’s achievements, but not quite assimilating their implications. It suggested the need for leadership in some key areas without mapping the direction for the industry overall. There is a lot to think about in the sector, and many are talking about deconstructing and reconstructing microfinance, which has followed largely the same models for the past 20 years. Parallel to the proceedings, US-based nonprofit Accion held a meeting of its affiliates challenging them to rise to the task. Some institutions have begun to take on the challenge, and there have been some interesting results. For example, some MFIs have bet on growth through international expansion, both south-to-south, but also south-to-north. Mexico’s Financiera Independencia’s purchase of a San Francisco-based MFI is one of a growing number of examples. For others, it has meant experimenting with technology and delivery mechanisms to reduce costs in their home countries. I am consistently impressed with the new centralized credit analysis process of Ecuador’s Banco Solidario.

At FOROMIC, MIF/IDB proposed that the challenges ahead include: (1) “green” finance - some efforts displayed at the conference made me think green is just around the corner; (2) supporting small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) - although I am not convinced we’ve helped microentrepreneurs enough to move on to SMEs; (3) broadening financial inclusion to savings and insurance - where there is still much work to be done; and (4) supporting consumer protection and transparency within microcredit - which I view as a necessary response to an industry that is ever more focused on the bottom line. Many institutions still are wondering what’s around the corner and are looking for leadership from organizations like MIF/IDB. If government-backed organizations and NGOs choose not to provide this leadership, big commercial players will step in and push through their own agendas, for better or for worse.

Emerging Perspectives on Youth Savings

The authors of this paper argue in favor of familiarizing poor individuals with savings programs, especially younger people. Although it is difficult for youth from low-income families to save, financial providers can offer tailored savings plans to meet the needs of these groups. This paper examines the potential opportunities and obstacles faced by financial service providers and policymakers that seek to increase the use of savings plans by youth in developing nations. According to the paper, there are 1.2 billion youths worldwide between the ages of 15 and 24, most of whom live in developing countries, indicating an enormous potential for financial service providers who target this group. According to the World Bank’s Global Financial Inclusion Database (Findex), approximately 4.2 million youth have access to financial services worldwide as of 2012.

The authors encourage institutions to work to eradicate the idea that youth are “irresponsible, unable to handle money, and risky due to a lack of collateral.” Proponents of youth savings stress the importance of starting to save early and argue that youth savings programs can “promote asset-building,” teach good financial habits and ultimately improve a country’s overall savings rate. Policymakers also need to examine the legal age for youth to enter into contracts, which is a potential obstacle, as well as the widespread lack of identification papers. Financial service providers must also overcome low profitability due to smaller deposits, fewer transactions and fewer product purchases by youth. On the other hand, potential advantages include gaining market share, delivering on corporate social responsibility, building the organization’s brand and nurturing a loyal customer base at a young age.

The paper ends with a review of the considerations that policymakers and financial service providers should heed in order to implement youth savings programs optimally. Financial institutions first must look at potential profitability to determine whether it is worth serving youth. If it is, they need to determine if the products they currently offer to adults can meet the needs of youth or if they need to tailor new financial products to this market segment. Lastly, the authors argue that more studies on the social impact of youth savings would help policymakers promote the concept.

Strategic Framing Work(s):
How Microcredit Loans Facilitate Anti-witch-hunt Movements

This publication summarizes a study of microfinance and its effect on witch hunts in the town of Jhalpaiguri in the Indian state of West Bengal. The seven-month study examines self-help groups of eight to 10 local women who were participating in a government program that provided entrepreneurial loans in amounts equivalent to USD 18. The authors of the study found that women participating in the self-help groups have been influential in stopping attacks against women in the town. Witch hunts, which sometimes occur as a reaction to illness or death within the community, often result in the murder of the women accused of being witches. In one case, self-help group members formed a vigil outside the house of a woman accused of being a witch and stopped village members from attacking her. The authors state that increased mobilization against these witch hunts by members of the self-help groups is most likely if two conditions are met: (1) leaders of the self-help groups are able to “tap into” the groups’ potential for collective action; and (2) these activists can “use strategic framing to present an argument about the congruence of microcredit and anti-witch-hunt goals.”

A Simple Poverty Scorecard for Myanmar

This document presents a poverty “scorecard” that can be used to estimate whether a household in Myanmar lives on an income lower than USD 1.25 per day. The scorecard was developed using Myanmar’s 2009 - 2010 Integrated Household Living Conditions Assessment and includes 10 questions that are designed to be quick for field workers to collect and verify.

Questions include the number of members in the household, the highest level of education of the heads of household, building materials of the house and appliances used in the house. The publication describes how the scorecard can be used to track changes in poverty over time and to target services for poor people more effectively.

What Are Clients Doing Post the AP MFI Crisis?

This brief analyzes the impact on microfinance institution (MFI) clients of the downturn in the microfinance sector that occurred in the Indian state of Andhra Pradesh in 2010. The research team used focus group discussions and other “participatory” research methods, relative preference ranking and financial sector trend analysis for July 2011 and August 2011 in three regions of Andhra Pradesh: Telangana, Rayalaseema and Coastal Andhra. Government officials, bank officials and field staff were interviewed, as were MFI borrowers. Approximately 60 percent of MFI borrowers included in the study had taken loans from moneylenders while MFIs were offering little if any credit. In 66 percent of the participatory research sessions, participants said high interest rates charged by moneylenders and daily finance corporations were the strongest reasons not to take out loans, followed by inadequate loan size. Approximately 90 percent of respondents expressed willingness to repay their pre-crisis loans from MFIs if other clients also repaid and MFIs began disbursing new loans.

When asked about the competitiveness of MFIs, respondents said they like the short loan processing times as well as the relatively low interest rates and “doorstep delivery.” On the other hand, many clients stated they dislike the group responsibility model and the lack of flexibility in loan repayments. The authors conclude with recommendations for boosting the sector in the future.
